Then Frederica saw him, illuminated in the moonlight. It was Alex. Tall and mysterious, clad in a trench coat, with a Japanese steel katana clutched in his left hand. The blade was red. Red with the werewolf's blood, she realised. This was quickly removed with a swish and dramatic flick from Alex's wrist.

"Frederica..." he muttered, almost inaudibly.

"I love katanas," she replied, and then continued too quietly to hear: "and you..."

Before Alex could continue to converse with her he was set upon by another three werewolves. They didn't seem interested in her anymore. They just seemed interested in Alex. Frederica couldn't say she blamed them.

Frederica Williams is the new girl at Trenton High, having just moved to Trenton, New Jersey following the mysterious demise of her parents. There she meets Alex Murnau, a pale and attractive young man who seems delightfully formal, and Darren, who is pretty much the opposite. Almost as if the two of them are meant to represent opposite extremes. At least they're not at all similar to any other characters in popular culture.

Frederica begins to feel torn between the friendship (and possibly more) of both of these boys, especially as neither really seems to approve of the other.

How will Frederica get through this difficult time? She has a lot to learn about life and love, and throughout the hilariously dry parody of Twilight, dark romance, and young adult fiction she learns to remove the shackles of societal expectations, and come to terms with who she really is in no uncertain terms.

A Dark Hand is a short novella of 12,000 words.
