Robert Crosier an ex-mariner is assigned to the Britain's World War II military strategy team in Washington involved in persuading the American President and Joint Chiefs of Staff to drop their plan for a small scale invasion of mainland Europe in 1942/43 and support the alternative proposition of the North African Torch landings. Admiral King refuses to change his mind about the risks of troopships from the USA being sunk on their way to North Africa because there is evidence that Doenitz is holding about 30% of his submarines in reserve, probably to support a 'surge' once American troopships depart from the USA.

Robert develops a plan to try to deceive Doenitz into by seeking to persuade him the 1942 Dieppe Raid is actually the first stage in a joint Allied forces small scale invasion of mainland Europe. General Marshall, President Roosevelt and Admiral King approve the plan and give the undertaking that if the deception causes the Germans to drop their strategy of keeping submarines in reserve, the Americans will participate in the Torch landings.
